The Story

There was once a simple village that had no internet and no mobile phone. It was a pretty peaceful place with beautiful scenery. Every home in the village had a house, a BBQ area, a vegetable garden and a pond. There was much to do, and everyone lived happily together.

The challenge

Every day a fire would start anywhere in the village, the villagers would have to beat the fire as fast and accurate as possible! Their garden would wither, their water tanks would run dry and their food supplies would dwindle. All the while the fire would keep expanding until the entire village was engulfed and there was nothing the villagers could do to stop it.

The villagers received no help from the state, there was no internet, no fire service, the nearest fire station and hospital was 40 km away and there was no mobile phone service. How was everyone supposed to save the village from the blazing inferno?... Escala black box from Puck Blue, on one day had a friend and i found this game her, i was curious on what it was like. Stuff i found as the developer said the it's not a flash game but rather a game for android and it's self contained in the app with no downloads, no internet and other tasks that we found, and it's free!

Like many of you I got into games at a later age of life than many others, and there are players who came of age in the video game world during the early 2000's, and many who were already adults for that matter. Some of us have fond memories of the day... Ecosystems: Forming Communities in the Digital World A lot of people wouldn't know what games are if you could have thrust a knife in their heart. People just don't understand the concept of a game. Believe it or not, some games have enormous reach; they are played

"Beat the street." Beat the street is an Action/Platform/Puzzle game for the web browser. It takes place in a simulated street where you can manipulate it's objects (cars, pedestrians, etc.) to guide the leader of your gang, Scooter, through a series of missions. Your goal is to complete these missions, but there's a twist: You can only move the cars in the style that the cars will move. For example, if a car would move forward if you move forward, but moves in the opposite direction if you move backward, you can control the movement with the solution that the car reacts. Change your movement like in a platformer, or stay still and change the world around you. You can even rearrange the environment and catch people off guard. No one can anticipate where you'll go next. Get ready to collect money, to steal cars, and to cook stuff for drugs. Watch out! I'm currently using spring-security to handle authentication on a web app, and it's working great in my local environment, but I need to run it on a public server as well. Since the public server is going to be a load balancer - I need to know what the most appropriate way of handling authentication across the two environments. I know you can configure it to run a different instance of spring-security for the different environments, but is there any way I can combine the two to keep the stuff as DRY as possible? A: It makes no sense to combine the two. The way you handle authentication differs from environment to environment and between different environments. To take a typical example, you have two production environment (one web tier, one backend). You have both the same authentication-aware services (spring-security, whatever else), but with the only difference is the best known and most used OData server. However, in this post I'm going to demonstrate a better way to expose a graph database through OData with the power of Apache Arrow. OData has been designed as a way to expose a variety of data sources to a number of applications - in the same way that REST has become very popular for pulling data from an existing application. There are a number of different OData services and middlewares to do this. Virtuoso, the state of the art server for OData, was originally designed by mongrel creators, but much of its source code has since been rewritten in Java as a service to provide fast, efficient, and reliable OData support. That is now open source under the Apache license. With Virtuoso, you can use Apache Jena resources as your data sources. Currently, Virtuoso works well with Cassandra, MongoDB and HBase. Even the underlying Jena engine has been optimized for use with these stores and is able to return the data in less time than for traditional relational databases. However, there are a number of other highly performant open source graph databases available for OData (ODash and OGraphDB being the two most talked about). The question of which one to use will probably depend on the data sources you have and your current graph database support. Virtuoso is just a component of the data architecture; you can use Virtuoso for different purposes and graph database patterns. OData is very easy to use. Virtuoso has support in almost every application library in Java, including the immensely powerful Apache POI. These days, I use it with JApplet applications, with Spring's ODataSpringDataSource to support automatic detection of OData end points, and with Liquibase, which is a nightmare to get working with plain JDBC. You can configure OData with the rest of your Spring Boot applications by just adding the configuration classes with: The main differences between the two server implementations are that Virtuoso Server is a REST server and Apache Arrow is a real graph database. Although they can share the same data sources (REST and graph can both use the same Cassandra backend). Apart from that there's a different API with which you connect to the server (although Virtuoso's support for the underlying infrastructure that allows it to serve information from multiple servers can only be done via pure-REST). In this post we'll show how
