Review article: blood and liver samples for diagnosis of hepatitis E in livestock. The aetiology of enterically transmitted acute hepatitis in livestock is mainly the group of enterically transmitted zoonoses known as the hepatitis E viruses. Although it is increasingly appreciated that hepatitis E viruses are a worldwide problem of considerable clinical importance, there has been limited interest in studying such infections until recently. A better understanding of the molecular biology of these viruses has led to developments in nucleic acid amplification methods to increase the sensitivity of detection. This in turn has stimulated substantial laboratory activity in the area of the diagnosis of hepatitis E virus infection. This review
