This is a continuing lesson, in which we'll add two more ways to implement an activation key in our product: Having all license keys be digital signatures of some small, fixed-length initialization data (with the initialization data used as the private key); Having the license keys be digital signatures of some large, fixed-length initialization data (which is itself a digital signature of the product's hardware id, and we can embed this large binary data in a signed object). Finally, you should make sure that VPN Unlimited 3 users cannot connect with VPN Unlimited 6 by disabling the software key. This way, you make sure that, in the unlikely event that someone has circumvented the usual licensing validation, they will not be able to connect. If you are using a revocation server, you don't need to reinstate the license when the device is rebooted. This is because the revocation server will always verify the license using the hardware id, not the product serial number. The revocation server simply keeps a record of license statuses, updating the status of the license each time the device is rebooted. If the license is still valid, no action is necessary; if it was revoked, the revocation is sent to the device and the license becomes revoked. Create a new license. You can use the 'real' serial number if you want to. On the one hand, it will make revocation more complicated; on the other hand, you'll be sure to be covered, even if you ever decide to change your serial number. If we decide to add a future product or update, we don't have to change the existing license keys - we can just change the serial numbers for each existing product.
