Transitional design process for a long-term care facility. This paper details a five-part, problem-based methodology for a long-term care facility that included a team of problem-solvers. The first step in this process was to examine existing facility problems and understand why they occurred. Residents' goals, families' expectations, and the facility's culture must be aligned to ensure the transition is successful. During the first step, many aspects of the facility and the long-term care (LTC) profession can be learned, all of which will support a successful transition. The methodology presented here can be used to create successful transitions in any facility.
