HID® Software Solutions are available in over 100 countries.. Full Specifications and Feature List. Some American citizens living abroad are getting a taste of the U.S. immigration system. In December, the Department of Homeland Security issued a rule that immigration officials can't make an exception to the requirement that when determining whether to deport an individual, agents have to take into account "the fact that the person, whether lawfully or unlawfully present in the United States, may have close family ties in the United States." That means, according to the department, that individual citizens and their family members should have the chance to make their case at their deportation hearings. The Obama administration has said this is part of an effort to crack down on so-called "chain migration." The new rule came into effect in January. Last month, a federal judge granted a stay so that the administration can continue to make exceptions for people with close ties to U.S. citizens or lawful permanent residents. The result, say critics, is that U.S
